Camellias

WE HAVE Camellias blooming in our greenhouse from November through March, and suggest that if possible you come to see them and make your selection. If there is any certain variety that you would like to have, write us about it. Besides those listed in this catalog we have a number of varieties on hand in too limited a supply to offer here, but it is possible that some of them are just what you are looking for.

All our specimen plants are well branched, and are graded according to height.

Cultural Directions for Camellia japonica and Azaleas

Both Camellias and Azaleas will grow in full sun if protected for the first few summers with a lattice frame. These plants will not bloom well in dense shade, but partial shade suits them to perfection.

October to June is the best time to set out the plants, though if carefully handled they may be planted in any month. One important point to remember is that they should never be set any deeper than they were in the nursery. Camellias will die if the stalk is covered with more than 2 inches of soil.

Acid soil is absolutely essential, with a plentiful supply of vegetable matter made up of peat, muck, or rotted leaves. This material helps to maintain an even supply of moisture and to provide the kind of plant food needed. Lime or alkaline soil is to be avoided at all costs, and if lime is present in the ground it must be removed. Leaf mold from oak and other hardwood trees makes an excellent bed for Azaleas and Camellias.

Good drainage is another necessity. The plants must be placed where all surplus rainfall will run off quickly. They require moisture, but soil that remains water-saturated for any length of time is not suitable.

Sometimes these plants are attacked by a scale insect. This pest is readily controlled by spraying with Garden Volck at the rate of 1 pint to 6 gallons of water. Be sure to cover the underside of the leaves as well as the upper.
